FAS/FAE, and alcohol abuse by the mother is not seen to be necessary. In some cases, just the fact that the child is Indigenous is enough for non-medical persons to perceive prenatal alcohol exposure had occurred, especially if the child has been in foster or adoptive care, or is from certain urban or reserve communities where alcohol abuse is perceived to be high.

In the weeks following the workshop, a report was produced and delivered to the IGH and to the workshop participants (Greaves, Poole and Cormier). While I gave a small amount of feedback to the organizers, at the time I could not imagine how any kind of meaningful research recommendations could come out of what felt like a very disjointed debate and discussion. However, much to my surprise and appreciation, I received a report in which the authors carefully describe and analyze the information given, producing a set of research recommendations that challenge the assumptions and questionable practices attached to the category FAS and the treatment of pregnant women. After having reviewed the report I not only feel that it signifies a successful representation of the ideas expressed and debated at the workshop, but it also attempts to redefine, at least to some degree, the ways in which research questions attached to alcohol use by pregnant women should be framed and researched in the Canadian context.

The Blue Ribbon

horses that prance at the starting line with eyes that devour the distance to the finish his eyes eat the floor between us my eyes consume the length to the door

I’m the faster runner but it is the bang of the signal that always freezes me

I’m used to it now and I’ll run like I’m meant to whether there are green fields or brown grass past the door the blue sky will be above my head the blue sky will be above my head
