failure to care for its most vulnerable citizens.

The safety net fails in several ways. Two-thirds of single parent households are not in subsidized housing, although half of these are on waiting lists. Many have been waiting for more than two years. Social assistance payments—either general welfare or Family Benefits—fail to provide for basic needs.

What do these women really want? Popular wisdom has it they want to stay home, have babies, and be supported. But 73 per cent of women surveyed said the thing that would make the greatest difference in their lives was a job. Seventy-five per cent wanted cheaper housing. Sixty-three per cent wanted more education or job training. This is a picture of people struggling to survive in a society where they are given less opportunities.

Let us hope that when this recession ends we will never again stand for the erosion of programmes designed to maintain people in health and dignity through rough periods in their lives. In the meantime, during this recession, we need a great public outcry against governments that put deficit reduction before hungry people, and blame those very people for their hunger while balancing budgets on their backs.

Talking

I am learning to listen to myself and watch while I say poverty for property not missing a beat

I expose myself like an Ihalmuit shaman to howling winds and unfathomable hunger to gainsay

Chasm

They get in through the walls the cracks in the foundation and floor the chasm under the livingroom windows where Summers a sow-thistle grows blooms if tended toward Fall inside my house mice don't need much space even less for going out again mornings I find them cringing near my pillow or in fractions in miscellaneous, amputated bits half-eaten twice now they've left their precisely abandoned faces on my carpet: whiskers taut, tiny clenched teeth, eyes bulging alert watching waiting for my house to crumble.

Maura Storey lives on a farm north of Saskatoon, Saskatchewan, and works on contract as an educational consultant.
