

MARY ANN FENIMORE

Women Learning: Thunder in the bones

Insights of our lives lurk in dusty obscuring spider webs and daily events stack like teetering hiccups on the ledges of our gathering learnings.
Lightening splinters through decrepit patterns of sculpting meanings to each other and multitudes of smug perceptions rumble for new positions, like thunder in the bones of stampeding elephants.
Minds and visions free themselves for flight and prepare for surprising landings, while other longings gather strength for cooling down the learning chaos, for re-orientation to the places we find ourselves settling in like slow-motion landings on grandmother's feather bed.
And all the while the learning seeps through every crevasse of every creature, human and non slurping up and shortening down the spaces of not quite knowing just what's going on!
And the arm bones raise and shake the finger clapping skyward and women's learning thunders on.

The Ageling

A young woman dragged a pot with the Himalyan Birch sapling out from amongst its nursery buddies.
And envy punched me in the stomach as I sat upon a small, portable seat attached to my cane, arthritic back pain demanding that I sit.
The trail of the dragged sapling pot drew a line between the young, blonde, strong back and my ageling body that would no longer allow me
the garden pleasures of heavy stones and heaped shovels.
I hobbled to the shielding of the Mountain Ashes
and my tears joining the irrigation trickles, joined the tears of ancient agelings, joined the tears of those who could no longer dig and drag the soils of their ancestors and their selves.
We bought the Himalayan sapling and planted it in the Earth of our home where it broke free of its pot bindings and spread itself into new spaces.

milieu

a new press for women writers in Canada invites submission for our first annual portfolio anthology 2004 milieu press is devoted to inventive, edgy, visionary women writers who occupy the page with unintimidated narratives and imaginative forms. Our portfolio anthology will feature selections from works-in-progress by emerging to established women writers of poetry, creative non-fiction, and lyric prose. The intention of this annual anthology is to provide a more immediate glimpse of cutting-edge work currently being written in Canada. We anticipate that the selected 15 – 20 portfolios will, by proximity, invigorate a broader discourse regarding content and craft not only among women writers but for readers and those working within the literary industry. For detailed submission guidelines, please contact portfolio@milieupress.net.
