The “oral song” also brings into focus the final words of her essay: “Most of all there is the centrality of poetry” that is indeed “layered like amber” throughout this book.

This centrality, this searing focus that only poetry can achieve (even when the form is prose) makes this collection compelling. In much of the writing here, we have language that is “controlled”—controlled so completely that it makes chaos clear, lays bare to the very bone truths too difficult to think of; and it does so with an ease that includes the reader.

As I read, I find myself nodding my head, scribbling my question, setting my own answers beside theirs. Suddenly my own exile is very clear to me. As a wee girl in Liverpool—that outport of Ireland—sent away at eight years old as a wartime evacuee from a lovely, dirty, big port to a “safe haven” in a Welsh village and told to be grateful, to be good, to mind the farmer, to brush my teeth and say my prayers every night. How else to respond but by rebellion?

And my rebellion has never really ended. I lost my self on that short train journey in September 1939. My losses included tradition, language, place, family—privations that writers here explore—and although I ran away four times to get back to those realities I could reach out for, I was an old woman before I got myself back. This book helped me retrace my journey and it will do the same for many women. For me, Nuala Archer’s “Sheela-Na-Gigging Around” says it best:

She’s important enough to be left out powerful enough to be hidden away alive enough to be killed poet enough to be censored.

Here’s to the Sheela in us all and our stories to be told and our lives to be shared. Read this book, then start to tell your own story.

DAUGHTERS FOR SALE: POETRY AND PROSE

STAINED GLASS: A NOVELLA

by Eva C. Karpinski

Guernica Editions, a Toronto-based small press publishing house founded by Antonio D’Alfonso, has done a lot in the past 20 years to promote Italian-Canadian and other ethnic writing. Despite government cuts, this year Guernica has managed to publish several new titles, among them these two books by Gianna Patriarca and Concetta Principe.

Although one is a collection of poetry and prose and the other a novella, they have many common threads. The issue of ethnicity is thematically central to both books as each writer, by creating different literary personae, is trying to come to terms with a cultural rift caused by immigration and/or living between two cultures. Italian and Canadian influences also commingle in the formal and stylistic choices made by the authors, from Patriarca’s orchestration of distinctly Italian-Canadian voices and her echoing of Elizabeth Smart and Dorothy Livesay, to Principe’s experimental conversion of the novella into the genre of modern-day hagiography. Both rely on a personal, confessional mode, which invites autobiographical reading. Finally, they both use “small” personal experiences to address “big” questions concerning the meaning of human life and the need for connectedness.

A little girl about to leave for Canada, clinging to her grandfather’s knees in her refusal to go—the first image conjured by Patriarca in an autobiographical essay that opens Daughters for Sale—already foreshadsame as the changing of seasons in the poems “Winters” or “The Last Season,” she registers and contemplates bodily changes, trying to make sense of life in the face of mutability and death. Dedicated to her deceased friend Marisa, Patriarca’s book is literally a book of memory which functions as both a link to the past and a site of mourning. But this rather sombre tone is constantly subverted by her sense of humour and occasional playfulness, as for example in “Ode to Balls.”

Writing about childless women, intercultural marriages, traditional gender roles, patriarchal families, infidelities, marriage break-ups under the strain of immigration, Patriarca reveals phenomenal empathy for her subjects. Her irony is always tempered by compassion. Indeed, the setting of her intense relationship that leads to her breakdown, in contrast to sober Toronto where she tries later to recover her grip on reality. All these multiple splits are also reflected in pronominal shifts, as the narrator’s “I” shifts to “she” and “you” when talking about the past. Such use of pronouns parallels her arriving at a sense of self through religion, namely her conversion to Catholicism, which she experiences as rebirth. Baptized as “Clara,” in reverence to the tradition of visionary and ecstatic writing of medieval women-saints, she takes on the qualities of a mystic—anorexic, haunted by visions of Mother Mary, obsessed with the presence of miracles in her life.

Her choice of Catholicism is primarily an aesthetic, symbolic gesture. It represents the movement from the profane to the sacred, enacted by the plot of the novella. It also points toward the narrator’s need to reclaim her childhood with its lost language and her Italianness. Her central trauma, a miscarriage, becomes a metaphor of her loss: not only the promise of the child which died in [her], but also a little girl she used to be. The narrator’s Catholicism also accounts for her persistent coding of characters in terms of Christian symbolism (her lover’s name is Christophe while she herself is referred to as “x”). Throughout there are associations of Christ with sacrifice, a necessary part of progression from empty, sterile life to spiritual fulfillment, from sexual politics to love.

Not accidentally, her search for love coincides with her search for God, who has abandoned the world, or, as she puts it, “has come and gone.” The absence of God creates a sense of apocalypse and doom, which is further reinforced by the linking of private and public suffering. The narrator’s personal crisis unfolds against the backdrop of the 1990s, global political and economic crisis, including the threat of Quebec’s separation, the Oka standoff, the impending Gulf War, and record unemployment. It is as if the narrator’s body has internalized hunger, desert, betrayal, and wars raging around her, offering her a devastating discovery of “how little love there is in the world [and] how much of the stuff we need.”

In this context, the metaphor in the book’s title can refer to this imperfect vision of reality, marred by pain like a window stained with tears. But stained glass is also a mosaic of pieces and as such it can stand for the book’s theme and composition. Principe combines intertextual allusions and images from mythology, the Bible, dream analysis, the history of painting, fairy tales, lives of the saints, the news, even movies. Taken as a portrait of the artist, the novella seems to suggest allegorically that the stained glass vision may be an inescapable condition of the ethnic writer.

FALL ON YOUR KNEES

by Patricia F. Goldblatt

Stories about families fascinate us. We want to be voyeurs, peering through lacy curtains into the dark recesses of people’s living room parlours, kitchens, and bedrooms, examining the tenacious relationships that are enjoyed and enjoined by blood. Like archaeologists, we search for the fragments that explain the cracks and ruptures of aberrant behaviour. Fall On Your Knees by Ann-Marie MacDonald is the chronicle of the tangled, twisted Piper family.
