Like My Aunts

Like Aunt Maria outside Leningrad, at eighty-four I shall live on a heel of black bread and cucumber slices, intending to haul myself up to boil the kettle for tea, while I wait for pastries with poppy seeds, my murky eyes seeing gold onion domes against indigo skies, instead of burnt barracks across the lane through blizzards of snow or bullets, and, humming Tchaikovsky, I'll rarely allude to deportations, the Siege, or children and dogs lost to artillery shells, famine, the stew pots of neighbours...

Like Aunt Jean who died at sixteen, overdosed with morphine when she fell from her horse, (and she "the beautiful one, the talented one," while my fat younger mother clung to her fugues),

I too dream: center stage, when I've memorized every part in every Shakespeare play (Aunt Jean did), with Sarah Bernhardt (who attended her school performance in Kansas City, Missouri) out there clapping, clapping...

Like the aunt I invented, I'll spend old age painting medieval murals on crumbling walls, while twenty-five cats mill around and social workers bang and bang at my door.

You powerhouse aunts, unaware of your legacies, all you asked of slippery fate was to live to the hilt.
I drink to aunts who will drop their knitting, kick off galoshes, slip on dancing shoes or hiking boots, perhaps use too much rouge, black lace trailing beneath the hem, a cigarillo thrust in their lips, and a slug of blackberry brandy poured in our tea — Oh, aunties!

Elisavietta Ritchie is a writer, photographer, editor, and translator. In addition to seven collections of poetry, she has published Flying Times: Stories & Half Stories (Signal Press,

Photograph

If only I could photograph your pain give you a print to carry in your wallet whenever you felt the urge you could reach into your hip pocket and pull out a worn creased snapshot

and feel the pain
feel it
feel it until the desire waned

this could catch on

photograph

a beaten woman in her hospital bed or better yet crumpled in the corner trap her pain anger bitterness and determination determination to gather up the fragments bundle them into an old pillowcase and slink out the back door whenever the welfare cheque wouldn't stretch the kids were pukes and her thighs softened in disremembering

her oldest daughter could bring out the yellowed picture and pin it up beside the phone before defeated fingers forgot and dialed home.

Sheila Peters teaches writing for Northwest Community College in British Columbia. Her background as a writer includes journalism, poetry, and short stories. Her play, A Height of Lane, was produced in Smithers, B.C. in 1991.